“To say that Puritanism and Modernist Novels is ambitious is an understatement. I am most impressed by the boldness and richness of Hinojosa’s complex, difficult thesis, which connects the historical emergence of Puritan hermeneutics to theories of the novel and British modernist novels by examining Robinson Crusoe, Dorian Gray, A Room with a View, Portrait of the Artist, and The Good Soldier.

Instead of perpetuating the conventions of Victorian fiction, the novel’s treatment of religion is itself a reassessment of and challenge to novelistic conventions. As with the other novels treated in this book, A Room with a View questions, exposes, and inverts perceived flaws in Puritanism, in its religious, social-moral and novelistic forms.

“They were a most unusual group of colonists. Instead of noblemen, craftsmen, and servants - the types of people who had founded Jamestown in Virginia - these were, for the most part, families - men, women, and children who were willing to endure almost anything if it meant they could worship as they pleased.”
